

Finding the cheapest office supplies that meet your needs is a full time job by itself. There are so many choices today. It's a time consuming exercise and often not worth the saving that you make. Time spent on telephone calls, travelling from one shop to another, preparing purchase orders and collecting products is rarely assessed. Many of the savings which we pride ourselves to have achieved are in fact "false savings" because we simply fail to account for the costs related to the resources engaged and time spent to realise such achievement.

The business environment is changing very fast. Competition is becoming fiercer with globalisation. Productivity has become an unconditional factor for survival. There is no more places for inefficiencies and hidden costs. To survive and succeed we must start thinking differently. Adjustments to what we are presently doing may not be the best solution even though they have worked successfully in the past. Businesses must concentrate in what they do the best. Time saved in purchasing office supplies can be used more efficiently to improve the procurement, sourcing, stock management and control over the utilisation of your primary products and your services. Many companies and even government bodies have understood the need to review their costs structures and business processes. The financial crisis has certainly been a boosting factor for many organisations. However, be conscious of the need to change is one thing and knowing what and how to change is another thing. This issue small and simple as it may appear can make the whole difference in the success or failures of organisations.
